Key features and potential uses

- Potency: Infused with a significant amount of THC, usually in a small bottle (e.g., 1 oz or 2 oz).
- Fast-acting: Utilizes nano-technology for quicker absorption and onset of effects.
- Flavor: Often features the flavor of mango, sometimes blended with other tropical fruits like guava.

- Versatile: Can be consumed on its own or mixed into drinks, smoothies, or desserts.
- Potential effects: Can induce feelings of calm, happiness, relaxation, and energy, with a bold euphoric effect for seasoned users. Some products also claim to help alleviate symptoms associated with chronic fatigue, depression, headaches or migraines, and chronic stress.

Potential side effects and considerations

- High potency: Due to the high THC content, these syrups are intended for experienced users and require careful dosing. Consuming too much can lead to unintended side effects such as dizziness, nausea, blurred vision, and even hair loss (hypervitaminosis A).
- Digestive issues: Mangoes, even without the cannabis infusion, can cause digestive problems like gas, bloating, stomach pain, and diarrhea in some individuals, particularly those with fructose intolerance.
- Blood sugar levels: Mangoes contain natural sugars, which can cause blood sugar spikes, especially for individuals with diabetes.
- Legal status: Cannabis-infused products are subject to legal restrictions and regulations depending on your location. Ensure you are familiar with local laws before purchasing or consuming these products.
